

The selection and breeding of Australian plants

Digby Gowns and Mark Webb

The Australian native flora is generally horticulturally unimproved and many highly ornamental species are often difficult to grow due to their specialised growing requirements. Plant selection and breeding provides the opportunity to improve the adaptability of this flora under varying environmental conditions so they are more suitable for display in a wider range of public landscapes and home gardens.